As an artist and entrepreneur, I founded Nicole Alexandra Interiors LLC, a full-service interior design firm, so I can live my passions every day. As principal designer, I draw on over 15 years of wide-ranging creative experience to create beautiful, luxurious surroundings that are also comfortable, livable, and functional for my clients and their families. Inspired by my studies abroad at Lorenzo de Medici in Florence and my time working in fashion in New York City, I have traveled the world to study different cultures to develop my design aesthetic. I gravitate towards sophisticated yet warm spaces, where bold neutrals, natural elements, and often a touch of the exotic will make every project unique. My end goal is to design an environment that is meaningful to you and feels like home – but also looks like it belongs in your favorite magazine. I offer a complete range of design services, from inspiration to installation. Whether you want to simply refresh a room or engage in a full redesign of your interior, I welcome the opportunity to work with you and design a space that makes you proud. Born and raised in Boca Raton, I received my undergraduate degree in Marketing and Corporate Communications and my MBA from Bentley University in Boston. I live in Palm Beach County, Florida, with my husband and two children, Kensington (4), and Charles (2). Her work has been recognized in Architectural Digest, The New York Times, Mansion Global, and The Wall Street Journal. If your idea of an interior designer is someone who picks out fabric, spends time contemplating color and rearranges furniture to get it just right, you're not far off, but there is much more to the job. To be a successful interior designer you need to be creative and good with color, and you also need to be a good communicator, have people skills and be able to manage schedules, deadlines and budgets. While any one day can be drastically different from another, here's a good idea of the typical daily duties of an interior designer. Consult with New Clients When beginning a new job, the interior designer has a consultation with the client. This can take anywhere from an hour to half the day, depending on the extent of the job. A consultation involves talking about the project, finding out what the client needs and wants, figuring out a budget and deadline, and discussing ideas. This is an essential part of design, because the final product has to meet the needs and expectations of the client. If the client isn't happy at the end of the job, the designer has failed. Create Design Boards The fun, creative work for an interior design is just one part of a typical day. After a consultation, the designer can finally get down to business, using fabric, paint and color samples to craft the beginnings of a room design. This is likely to change and be refined after getting feedback from the client. Ultimately, the designer will create a detailed design for the room or project, usually with a computer program. Design for Function and Safety Designing an interior space is about more than just color and style. In addition to the design board, an interior designer will also take into account the function of spaces. This may mean determining how people will flow from one room to another, how the layout of a kitchen will make it easier to work in, or how the layout of an office building or hotel will reduce stress or be conducive to relaxation. Designers also make sure rooms and buildings meet existing safety codes. Source Suppliers and Contractors An interior designer does not complete projects alone. He or she needs to have partners on the job, including suppliers and contractors. The suppliers provide the needed materials, like tiles, fabric and furniture, while the contractors provide any necessary renovation work, such as carpentry, plumbing and electrical. Designers need to find good professionals to work with and whom they can rely on to do jobs well, on time and at the right price. A designer will then spend time each day communicating with contractors and suppliers about projects and updates. Update Clients Working with and communicating with clients is an important part of the job of interior design. Designers spend a significant amount of time updating people on the designs and the progress of their projects. This is often routine, but it can also be tricky. If there are unexpected issues, extra expenses or something the client wants but that the designer can't get, breaking the news becomes delicate work. A designer may have to deal with an unhappy or upset client and take steps to appease them. You can see that there is a lot of variety in the workday for an interior designer and that only some of the tasks are actually creative. The work environment shifts, which involves a lot of driving, from client homes and construction projects to suppliers and back to the studio or office again. There is also a potential for evening and weekend work, as most clients have their own jobs during the day and need to meet with designers at other times. Art and design careers are growing. You can get in on the trend and unleash your creative energies by becoming an interior designer. Consider starting with an interior design degree or certificate, or find a design firm willing to take on a trainee. With these steps you can begin a career that will be fun, challenging and rewarding. Explore all the options for your new career in interior design. InteriorsDesignEDU.org has all the information: schools, both campus-based and online, career requirements and recommendations, job search tips, job prospects by city and state and much, much more. Your career plan starts by selecting your state. An interior designer's day-to-day work life can follow a variety of paths, depending on his or her interests, training and aptitudes. No two designers are alike, and each brings something unique to the space that they are creating or enhancing. Below are just a few career paths and specialized training options. For designers just starting out, or who have chosen to get the most basic level of training, work may look a lot like that of an interior decorator. Many interior designers work in the furniture departments of department stores, helping customers coordinate furniture, rugs, lamps and accent pieces for their homes. Large home improvement stores offer full-service remodeling and renovations. Interior designers at these places work to help clients choose flooring, tile and fixtures that will fit their budgets, meet the specific needs of their families and fulfil their aesthetic desires. Kitchen and bathroom upgrades are some of the most popular renovations, both for clients staying in their homes indefinitely and for those hoping to add resale value to their homes. This is an area in which a specialized kitchen and bath certificate or degree could be very helpful. Many new housing developments offer a set selection of home exteriors and layouts, and the buyer can pick the colors, flooring, tile, fixtures and other features before the house is built. Interior designers work with buyers to map out the look of their new homes using available choices. Working within somewhat strict parameters such as these carries less risk and responsibility than handling a complete build-out. On the other end of the scale, the work of many certified interior designers looks a lot more like architecture: imagine a large, empty commercial building. To take something like that and turn it into, say, a medical clinic requires some specific skills and knowledge: electrical and lighting requirements for all equipment, specialized ventilation systems, managing sound transmission between treatment and reception and office areas, accessibility for staff and clients, and compliance with all local safety and environmental codes. Designers who create an interior from scratch will work closely with contractors, plumbers and electricians, and need to be able to create and read blueprints. Interior designers can specialize in private homes, lodgings such as cruise ships and hotels, medical facilities, institutions such as schools, libraries and other public buildings, or commercial spaces like stores, salons, restaurants or offices. Beyond the primary purpose of a space, however, interior designers can also specialize in meeting other criteria that can be just as important to clients. An advanced degree is not required to pursue a specialized certificate or to work in a specialized field of interior design. Many specialty certifications are available to designers with varying levels of formal education. Sustainability is an important factor in the mission plan of many corporations, municipalities, schools and private businesses. Some clients want to demonstrate their green credibility with a LEED certified building or space. LEED stands for Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design and is overseen by the United States Green Building Council. LEED is most often used for entire buildings, but when a client is just occupying part a building, or only has limited control over it, LEED for Interior Design and Construction is a great option. Designers can train and test to be certified as LEED ID+C Designers. Interiors certified by this program are rated on efficiency, sustainability and how healthy the created environment is for its inhabitants. Universal design is the concept of designing living spaces so they can be easily enjoyed by people of all ages and abilities. Several organizations offer courses and certifications in universal design. One such certification that is appropriate for interior designers is offered by the National Association of Home Builders. This certification covers designing spaces that are both functional and attractive, locating equipment and other resources, and finding solutions for multiple needs. NAHB also offers certification for Aging in Place Specialists. Aging in Place is a similar concept that focuses specifically on designing homes that will function well throughout the lifespan of their residents. Many people hope to stay in their homes for the duration of their lives. Aging in Place design modifications ensure that this can be done safely and comfortably, and makes life easier for family and caretakers as well. Kitchens and bathrooms are the most often renovated and can be the most expensive areas of a home. The National Kitchen and Bath Association offers a variety of certifications to those who want to be able to assure their clients that they truly understand the complexity of creating a comfortable, safe, functional and beautiful kitchen or bathroom. Interior designers may also specialize in areas such as lighting and windows. For facilities such as theaters, galleries, museums and stadiums, specialized knowledge on these topics is extremely valuable and in high demand. The same applies to furniture. Those who plan on investing a great deal on furnishings are happy to pay for the knowledge of an expert. An interior designer's career can take many different paths, and pursuing a particular specialty while maintaining general skills is a great way to become a valuable resource for your employer, or to create a niche for you to fill if you are working solo. Interior design professionals can provide needed services in one or several of the many different disciplines that fall under the interior design umbrella. Interior design is about combining aesthetic and practical solutions. It searches for a form that can be completely modern or taken from previous eras. In these lessons, you will learn about various styles and current trends in interior design. You will also get some knowledge about why some interiors attract attention while others are indifferent to us.Interior design is primarily cooperation with the investor. It's about creating space together. In order to start cooperation well, you should prepare adequately and present your offer as best as possible. Thanks to these lessons, you will learn how to evaluate your work based on many factors and how to encourage the client to cooperate with the help of a well-prepared offer.Each interior design requires proper preparation before we start creating the concept. Therefore, it is both theoretical and practical knowledge. It is based on an interview with the client but also on the preparation of basic drawings for the start of the project. These lessons will teach you how to consult as well as make initial measurements on the construction site.An essential aspect of the project is its presentation. Its appearance is also the showcase of the studio. Therefore, it should, above all, contain appropriate content and be legible but also aesthetically presented. In these lessons, you will get acquainted with what kind of elements a well-prepared presentation should include. In addition, you will learn simple ways to create a simple and consistent layout.The interior design should be characterized by appropriate ergonomics and the most functional layout of the space, which is to serve specific people. You will learn this approach across the lessons. It will help you to prepare particular functional solutions for each room. You will also learn how to deal with existing technical installations to realize the project easily.Designing is also an art, and this requires an idea. Finding an idea for a space is crucial for the design to be aesthetic and consistent. Thanks to these lessons, you will know where and how to look for ideas and create an exciting vision based on the preferences of the designer and investor. You will also understand how to present the concept to the investor so that he understands your idea.Creating a good concept is the key to success. Interior design is based on testing various solutions and matching the ideal ones. One of the best tools for this is 3D software, which helps you develop the creative process and properly present the idea to the client. These lessons will teach you how to create an interior based on a three-dimensional model.Currently, many finishing materials can be used in interiors, and it is worth knowing their advantages and disadvantages. Similarly, in the case of equipment, there are a lot of them, and they have different characteristics. These lessons will show you essential finishing materials and find out where to get material samples. You will also learn what equipment can be used in the kitchen and bathroom.For the project to become a reality, it must be implemented in accordance with the guidelines. For this, technical drawings are used, on the basis of which the contractor will be able to make all the elements. After these lessons, you will know how to prepare complete technical documentation for individual plans, diagrams, and views of the walls. You will also you will get acquainted with the preparation of a shopping list for the investor.Interior design is not only about arranging ready-made furniture but also about creating it from scratch. Many pieces of furniture must be made by a designer to best suit the space requirements. Based on these lessons, you will see what designing a piece of furniture looks like, from proposing the shape to choosing materials to the final drawings for their implementation. Skip to content Home ABOUT PORTFOLIO TABLETOP PRESS CONTACT The University of Iowa's School of Applied Human Sciences defines interior design as “a multi-faceted profession in which creative and technical solutions are applied within a structure to achieve a built interior environment.” Interior designers study their client's work or living spaces and apply a systematic and coordinated methodology to satisfy their needs and resources. Education Interior design requires formal training, typically from a two-year or four-year program from an accredited school. Education includes the study of color and fabric, computer-aided design (CAD) training, drawing, space planning, furniture design and architecture. Many designers even apprentice with established interior designers before taking up their own practice or joining a design firm. Credentials To practice as a designer, some states require interior designers to be licensed or registered. Some states also require the NCIDQ Certificate, the industry's recognized indicator of proficiency in interior design principles, to demonstrate their experience and qualifications. Although not needed everywhere, many interior designers elect to undergo credentialing and certification to set them apart from decorators. Duties An interior designer researches and analyzes their client's needs and plans interior layouts to make them physically, socially and aesthetically functional. They use technology to create virtual plans before coordinating with construction teams to carry out the design. Interior designers adhere to building codes and regulatory requirements and have strong problem-solving skills. Many interior designers have interior decorating skills and offer that service on top of the design. Who Interior Designers Work With Designers often work closely with architects, contractors and developers to create their design plans for the client. Some may work directly with homeowners or business owners.
